I held firm belief that one day I would witness God, experience miracles, and regain the ability to walk. I had encountered moments that strengthened this belief, despite being aware of the family curse and the tragedy of Epilepsy's death. Although I initially believed I would die in the accident, I also had faith that God's plan was different from what I had imagined. Despite doctors acknowledging the possibility of miracles occurring by chance, I yearned for more intervention. The paralysis I experienced was due to swelling in my spine, not severing it. This gave me hope that I could still regain the ability to walk. Even at the age of 40, I hold onto the belief that I am capable of walking.

It has been my ultimate life goal. My love for life persists because of my faith in God, and I possess the determination to endure any circumstance, whether I walk again or not. Simply having God by my side and knowing that “He is with me” brings me comfort and satisfaction. I simply long for my life to be filled with God’s miracles and to be self-sufficient without relying on others. Despite my underlying feelings of inferiority, I secretly yearn to be like any other girl, although I never express or share these desires with anyone. I am aware that I do not possess the rights or worthiness to demand such things. However, I hold onto the belief that “if I were to attain what I desire, I would never let it go for any reason”❤️.
